

PART 4: REVOLUTION AND FOUNDING

In this part of the course, we will study the story of America's Founding Fathers, who were both the leaders of the thirteen colonies in their struggle for rights against the British monarchy, and the leaders of the newly formed United States of America as its first presidents.

I. The Coming of the Revolution

A. The Writs of Assistance Case (1761)

1. Britain had defeated France in the Colonial Wars, but now it faced two new challenges: 1) a much larger territory to manage, and 2) a very large debt to pay.
2. Britain had laws, called Navigation Acts, to allow the king to get as much money as possible from his colonies. These laws forced colonists to trade only with Britain, and to pay a tax called a "duty" when bringing goods to England.
3. American colonists often traded directly with other colonies anyways. This is known as smuggling.
4. As the Colonial Wars came to an end, however, the British government needed more money and it decided to stop all smuggling.
5. Government officers were given "writs of assistance," special permission slips that allowed them to search anyone's property anytime, to look for smuggled goods.
6. This unlimited power to invade someone's property was against English traditions going back to the Magna Carta, which said that even the king was not above the limits of the law.
7. In 1761 a Boston lawyer named James Otis argued in court that the "writs of assistance" were against the "rights of Englishmen."
8. Otis did not win the case, but his arguments became famous.

B. The Proclamation of 1763

1. The British government did not want to have to manage all the new territory it had taken from France in the colonial wars.
2. It announced a law, known as the Proclamation of 1763, that forbade American colonists from moving into this new territory.
3. This angered the colonists who had organized the Ohio Company to take over that territory and fought to win it from the French.

C. The Sugar Act (1764)

1. In 1764, the tax on importing Molasses (obtained from sugarcane) was lowered by half.
2. It may seem surprising that this angered the British colonists in America, but there was more to it:
 - a) The previous tax was never really collected because smuggling was tolerated.
 - b) Smuggling was now going to be stopped by using British warships to stop smugglers.
 - c) Smugglers would not be allowed a trial by jury (an English tradition since the time of Henry II). Instead they would be taken to another colony, or to England, for a military trial.
