

VIII. The Era of the Balance of Power (1648-1789)

A. The World of Temporary Partnerships

1. Nations (like individuals) forge friendships on the basis of common values. In addition, they sometimes forge temporary alliances on the basis of a common enemy.
2. When this happens, it is common for people to say, “The enemy of my enemy is my friend.” This is false, however. As history demonstrates, when nations forge alliances on the basis of having a common enemy, they forge only temporary alliances. It's better to say: “The enemy of my enemy is my temporary ally.”
3. When temporary alliances are created between nations that otherwise would not be friends, it is because they are both threatened by a more powerful enemy. Hence, the purpose of the alliance is to combine the strength of the weaker nations to balance the strength of the enemy. The goal of such temporary is thus to create a “balance of power.”

B. The Shifting Alliances of England, Netherlands, and Spain

1. Although they were allies against Hapsburg Spain in the Reformation, England grew jealous of Dutch success in building a commercial empire, and attacked the Netherlands in the Anglo-Dutch Wars.
2. In 1664, New Netherlands became New York during these wars.
3. Then, quite suddenly, England and Netherlands were thrown together as allies—and even allied with their former enemy Spain!—because France began to covet the Netherlands (including the “Spanish Netherlands”, which is now Belgium.)
4. The driving force behind all the shifting alliances of this time in Western Europe was the greatest bully of the era: Louis XIV of France (r.1643-1715).
5. Louis had more power over his own kingdom than any other king up to that point in European history. He also believed in his “divine right” to rule. This made him into the first “absolute” ruler or “absolutist” in European history.
6. Since France was neither the richest state, nor the greatest empire, however, Louis intended to make his state greater by force.
7. A temporary alliance was formed by England, Netherlands, Spain, the Holy Roman Empire, and Sweden to stop him in the War of the Grand Alliance (1689-97). The “balance of power” was thus able to stop Louis XIV.

C. War of the Spanish Succession (1701-1714)

1. Louis XIV was married to a Spanish Hapsburg princess, Maria Theresa.
2. Her brother, Charles II died without an heir in 1700, and Louis hoped to put his grandson on the Spanish throne.
3. Of course, the rest of Europe could not accept Louis's plan to unite France and Spain.
4. Spain sided with France, fearing the breakup of its empire by the other nations, but the rest of Europe was against them creating another “balance of power.”
5. By the Treaty of Utrecht of 1714, Louis was allowed to place his son Philip V on the throne of Spain, but Philip had to renounce his claim to the French throne.

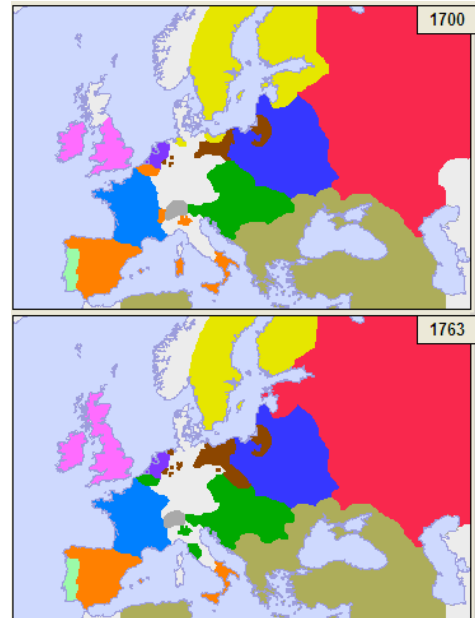

D. The “Balance of Power” in Central Europe

1. Although the Hapsburgs had failed to force the lords of the Germany to stay Catholic and to follow the rule of Holy Roman Emperor, they did succeed in holding on to Bohemia and growing their empire to the east.
2. After being attacked by the Muslim Ottoman Empire, they retaliated and made gradual progress creating a large new empire that swallowed their neighbor Hungary.

3. A powerful Calvinist lord, the Elector of Brandenburg, became a great rival of the Hapsburgs after the Thirty Years' War (1618-48), however when he inherited the Duchy of Prussia in eastern Poland, creating the combined “Brandenburg-Prussia.”
4. Following the Thirty Years' War, Brandenburg-Prussia was awarded territories in western Germany as part of the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 also, making a three-part country in northern Germany.
5. When Louis XIV of France decided to cancel the Edict of Nantes in France, many Calvinists fled France into other parts of Europe. Large numbers made their way to Brandenburg-Prussia, giving that country a major boost in power.

E. The War of the Austrian Succession (1740-48)

1. The Austrian Hapsburg ruler Charles VI died without an heir in 1740.
2. By this time, Prussia had grown into its own kingdom, and its leader, Frederick “the Great,” believed this was a perfect opportunity to attack Austria in order to gain land.
3. As Maria Theresa took the throne, he seized Silesia (a territory in western Poland) from the Hapsburgs.
4. When Prussia attacked Austria, France decided to become an ally of Prussia. (France's rulers had always feared the Hapsburgs, and were eager to see Austria weakened.)
5. Not wishing France to gain any advantage over them, England and Netherlands joined Austria's side.
6. Spain, where the grandson of Louis XIV was the ruler, joined France's side, i.e. became an ally of Prussia.
7. The major powers of Europe thus made temporary alliances that made a “balance of power.”
8. In the end, the temporary alliances prevented major changes to the map of Europe. Only Silesia, which Prussia has seized at the beginning of the conflict, changed hands., because Austria could not get it back.

The rise of Prussia (brown) in central Europe caused huge changes in the alliance system.

F. The “Diplomatic Revolution”

1. The War of the Austrian Succession changed the European balance of power. It showed that Prussia had become stronger, and Austria had become weaker. This caused all the countries to rethink their alliances to try to maintain an advantage.
2. England decided that Prussia was a better counterbalance to France, and switched its alliance from Austria to Prussia.
3. Austria and France, so long enemies, thus became natural “temporary allies.” (An alliance between France and the Hapsburgs had been unthinkable for 250 years, but now the calculations of the balance of power made created a “revolution.”)
4. Russia and Sweden both viewed Prussia as the greater threat to their own ambitions so another strange (almost “revolutionary”) outcome of this shift was that Russia and Sweden joined the same side (Austria) against Prussia—temporarily, of course.
5. The Seven Years' War (1756-63) followed, and Britain took North America from France, but the balance of power in Europe once again kept things stable.
