

D. The Birth of Triumphal Islam

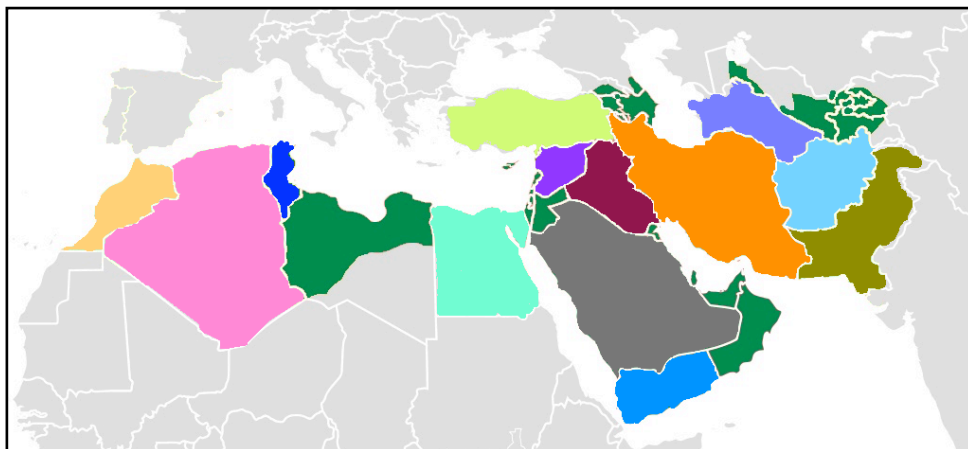

1. Islamic culture is a cardinal culture today because it began as a triumphal religious culture. (The concept “triumphal” can be a synonym for “triumphant” or “victorious,” but it also the expectation of triumph or confidence in victory. This is the meaning that matters most here.)
2. The religion of Islam began c.622 AD in Arabia, when an Arab merchant named Muhammad claimed to have received a revelation from God and was forced to leave the trading post of Mecca to escape north to Medina. This migration from Mecca to Medina is known as the “hejira” in Islamic culture.
3. The idea of a religious triumph is a part of the religion itself. Muhammad claimed to have received a message that superseded those of Judaism and Christianity. His, he claimed, was the third and final revelation, and the Arabs had been chosen by God (“Allah”) to be its champions. In Islamic culture, Christians and Jews were expected to convert to Islam, to acknowledge the supposed final word of God, and they must pay special taxes if they don’t. People of all other faiths have no rights except the right to convert to Islam.
4. The hejira is the beginning of the first “jihad” (holy war): the Muslim Conquest of Arabia (c.622-632 AD).
5. When Muhammad returned from Medina to conquer Mecca, he began a religious war to spread his new belief. He was thus two things at the same time: a prophet and a warlord.
6. When he had united the tribes of Arabia under his banner by force, Muhammad then famously sent two letters to the emperors of the Byzantine (Eastern Roman) and Persian empires. The letters had the same theme: convert or be conquered.
7. Muhammad did not live to enact these conquests himself, because he died in 632 AD, but his successors, known as “califs,” continued to conquer in the name of their religion. The Holy Land of Judaism and Christianity was conquered c.636 AD, and Persia was conquered c.651 AD.
8. Waves of conquest spread both westward, across North Africa and up into Iberia (Spain and Portugal today), and eastward into India. Both regions were invaded c.711 AD, soon after which Islamic culture reached its maximum extent.

A map of Arabia, with present day borders indicated, shows the locations of Mecca and Medina, where the story of Islam begins.

The Muslim empire or “Caliphate” created by Muhammad and his successors (the “califs”) stretched from Iberia in the West to India in the East. This empire, built in less than a century, was a key achievement that fueled the premise of religious triumphalism in Islamic culture.

Islamic culture today exhibits a state of disintegration by comparison. It consists of many different countries that are overpowered by non-Muslim neighboring countries and whose fate is essentially controlled by the United States as world police power, to the extent that it insists on using its power.
